A NOTE REGARDING THE PLOT

All artists dream of someday finding the ideal person who will build and boost their talent to the best advantage, dress them in the best of costumes; and arrange the best appointments for possible job openings with - "The Impresario". Impresarios, on the other hand, usually have an internal eye with which they can immediately stereotype their artists into categories ranging from: Sarah Bernhardts, Valentinos, dumb blondes, hysterical sopranos, glorified tenors; to those who are simply "unique".

NOTE ON THE TRANSLATION

The original libretto for "The Impresario" was written by Gottlieb Stephanie the Younger specially for the visit of the Governor General of the Netherlands to Vienna in February 1786. The subject, apparently suggested by the Kaiser Josef II, was a satire on the deplorable state of the German-speaking theater of the time. The German stage had up to this point in its history focused its efforts, such as they were, on crude, earthy humor. By 1785, however, things were beginning to change; Lessing and others were struggling to bring decency and discipline into the theater, but they were working against a long and strong tradition as well as strong public sentiment for the baser form of entertainment. It was to be another twenty years before Schiller and Goethe were to emerge from the Sturm und Drang that was the context of Stephanie's libretto.

To date no direct English translation of the complete German libretto has been published. English adaptations of the work have consistently paraphrased the original plot, omitted most of the spoken parts which appear in the first half of the play, and adapted the music to fit a revised cast of characters.

Tonight's production is a direct and complete translation of the original German libretto.
