Program subject to change
From the prologue to Purcell's Fairy Queen we have taken the scene of the Drunken Poet to serve for the missing prologue to Dido. Two Fairies and their entourage torment him for being drunk and for being a "scurvy poet". At the end of their torments he falls into a drunken slumber. He may be a scurvy poet, but one with a classical education: no wonder then that he dreams of Virgil's classic tale of Dido and Aeneas.

DIDO AND AENEAS - Part I

The Palace

We first see Dido, Queen of Carthage, in great distress. Her handmaiden Belinda guesses the cause: Dido has fallen in love with the handsome Trojan Prince, Aeneas, who has found refuge at her court after the fall of Troy. Belinda and the "Second Woman" lead the court in encouraging Dido to "Fear no danger" and allow herself to love. Shortly thereafter Aeneas declares his love to Dido. The Queen warns that fate is against their love, but Aeneas wants to defy it. Belinda reveals that Dido's eyes reveal her love. The court rejoices and celebrating the triumph of love and beauty they depart for a royal hunting party.

The Cave

The Sorceress and her witches plot the downfall of the queen and the destruction of Carthage. During the hunt, the Sorceress will send her elf, masquerading as Mercury, messenger of the gods, to bring Jove's order that Aeneas must pursue his fate by leaving Carthage immediately to go to Italy and found Rome. Against his will, Aeneas must forsake Dido. To hasten this moment, the witches cause a storm to ruin the hunting party. They all gloat over their demonic plan.
Dido, Aeneas, and their entourage are taking a break in a grove during their hunt. One of the queen’s ladies-in-waiting tells the tale of Actaeon, who died here, pursued by his own hounds, after he was turned into a stag as punishment for having seen the goddess Diana bathing in a fountain. Aeneas and his fellow hunters arrive chasing a wild boar. Dido suddenly hears thunder and sees dark, threatening skies. They all hasten back to Carthage. Last to depart, Aeneas is stopped by the Sorceress’s elf, disguised as Mercury. Pretending to speak for Jupiter, the spirit orders him to leave Carthage and fulfill his destiny. Aeneas is torn between what he believes is the god’s will of creating a new Empire in Italy and his love for Dido, but resolves to obey Jupiter.

The departure of Aeneas’s fleet is imminent. A Trojan sailor tells his companions to say goodbye to their Carthaginian girls. The witches rejoice over Dido’s misfortune, and the Sorceress plots the death of Aeneas in a storm she will create during his sea voyage. Dido has divined Aeneas’s change of plans, and her fears are soon confirmed: Aeneas tells her the gods have decreed he must depart at once and achieve his fated destiny. Outraged that Aeneas has thought of leaving her, Dido orders her deceiver to leave. Alone, the queen is overcome and dies. The Carthaginians mourn their beloved queen and call for cupids to scatter roses on her tomb.

EPILOGUE

Three arias from Fairy Queen serve as our epilogue. These arias represent Dido’s fitful “sleep of death” which allowed Anna Mansbridge to choreograph Dido’s dreams in close collaboration with the dancers Rosemary Adams and Warren Woo. First the allegorical figure of Night sings of nightfall and pleasant dreams. The figure of Secrecy then sings of “One charming night, which gives more delight than a hundred lucky days”. Here we see Dido and Aeneas in happier times. Finally, there is the lament “O let me weep”, the plaint of the abandoned woman: “He’s gone, and I shall never see him more”.
